An Incompetent Railroad Engineer. The danger of running on an engine han-dled by an incompetent engineer or a man who has remained at some other business who has remained at some other business long enough to get rusty is not fully under-steed by the traveling world. I had an ex-perience of that kind that drove me off the road and into more pleasant lines of labor. The lowa legislature passed a law in 1877 hotding all railroads responsible in heavy amenits for loss of life or injuries incurred in their service, and to offset the liability the railroad addressed a circular to all employes asking them to relinquish their claims. One morning I had fired up as usual, and run the engine around to await the freight which we asking them to relinquish their claims. One morning I had fired up as usual, and run the engine around to await the freight which we were to take west from Burlington. Before the hour an agent stepped up and asked the engineer to sign the agreement. He refused and was discharged on the spot. A new man was put in the cab. He had an engineer's license, and overything looked straight, so far as papers went. During the talk my first had an engineer's license, and overything looked straight, so had ran down, so I filled in cond until steam was hissing out of the safety valve, and then I opened the furmace door.

Having taken our train, an hour later we were spinning along nicely when I turned to feed the fire. Throwing open the door I observed the crown sheet and rivets showing through the fire box, and looked up at the gauge only to find that we were running with a dry boiler. I yelled to my partner, and he started out on the running board with a hammer in one hand. The pump had stopped working. The new man struck the metal gently to loosen the plunger. That's all I saw. I started over the coal in the tender, and, climbing up on the side of the first car, saw. I started over the coal in the tender, and, climbing up on the side of the first car, was not long in putting twelve or fifteen cars between me and that engine. Reaching the caboose and sitting on the cupcia, I waited for the explosion. If that fool with his harmer had successed in starting that pump he would have gone into eternity the next second, for the bailer was at a white heat. I wasn't in a suicidal frame of mind, and that's why I lit out. But the old adags about fools and children proved true, for that engineer had to stop, draw the first and wait for a relief engine. We had only run fifteen miles, but the damage in half an hour took three months to repair.—Globs-Democrat Interview.

The Ranchman's Commissary Department. A ranchman's life is certainly a very pleasant one, albeit generally varied with plenty of hardship and anxiety. Although occasionally he passes days of severe toil—for example, if he goes on the round up he works as hard as any of his men—yet he no longer has to undergo the monotonous druigery attendant upon the tasks of the cowboy or of the apprentice in the business. His fare is simple; but, if he chooses, it is good enough. Many ranches are provided with nothing at all but sailt pork, canned goods, and bread; indeed, it is a curious fact that in travelling through this cow country it is often impossible to get any milk or butter; but this only because the owners or managers are too lazy to take enough trouble to insure their own comfort. We curselves always keep up two or three cows, choosing such as are naturally tame, and so we invariably have plenty of milk and, when there is time for churning, a good deal of butter.

We also keep heas, which, in spite of the damaging inroads of hawks, bed cats and foxes, supply us with eggs, and in time of need, when our rifles have failed to keep us in game, with stewed, roast or fried chicken, also. From our garden we get potatoes, and unless drought, frost or grasshoppers interfere (which they do about every second year other vogetables as well. For fresh most we depend chiefly upon our provess as hunters.—Theodore Roosevelt in The Century. The Ranchman's Commissary Department

Semething in a Name.

I knew a man who opent years and a fortune in getting up a new decection of bitters. At last he had it is shape to sell it. He made about a million bottles of it, and had it advertised under a beautiful Greek name, which he had made up out of the dictionary specially to attract attention. And when he advertised it it sounded so like some chemical poison hat he couldn't get anybody to believe it was a simple "bitters." He failed. A name is all a patient medicine wants. A patient medicine nover makes studi popular from its merita. You've got to persuade people it will cure them before they take it, and then it does. The name is everything practically. Everybody knows that he has stood at street windows and looked at sumething he has no use for and longed to buy it just because it has an attractive name.—San
